CITY ENGINEER AND HIS ASSISTANTS.

The Retrenchment and Reform Report on Ordinance in Regard Thereto-The Southern Railway Can Lay Ite Tracks in Lombard Alley.

The April meeting of the Board of .1dermen was held last night at 8 o'clock. There were several unimportant discussions, and by a rule of the Council the report of the Conference Committee on the disagreement between the two branches over the pay of the foreman of the Lower Gas Works and other questions, the report of the committee was killed.

It was after 8 o'clock when President Turpin called the meeting to order, with the following members in attendance:

Messra, Bahen, Brock, Carter, Cutchins, Hardwicke, Moore, Noble, Smith, Snead, Starke, Vaughan and Zimmermann. The report of the City Treasurer for the past year was presented and on motion was referred to the Finance Committee.

THE ENGINEER'S OFFICE. From the Committee on Retrenchment and Reform came a report of examina-tions of the City Engineer's office. The committee submitted the following ordinance, which was unanimously adopted: "An ordinance as to the appointment of three assistant engineers and a clerk in the department of the engineer of the

DISCOURSE

Before the Woman's Club_A Representative and Crowded Audience. Guests of the Club.

Mr. Joseph Jefferson's dramatic discourse before the Woman's Club and its guests, goes down as all that was expected of it, in the light of the brilliant actor's world-wide reputation professionally, and his known personal charm. At no time in its history have the Club quarters been so taxed to hold the audience, and at no time has the audience been s horoughly and delightfully representative. Long before 2:15 every chair in the par was the opening hour, people were crowded three deep on every step of the stairway leading to the second floor. The hall was so closely filled that passage through it was impossible, and the little rear room and porch in the rear of the pariors were also filled. Not more than two-thirds of ne atslicace were able to even co HIS APPEARANCE.

ence. MR. JEFFERSON'S TALK.

TRAGEDY AND COMEDY. TRAGEDY AND COMPANY.

In Garrick's time, said he, a picture was painted of him scated between the muses of Tragedy and Comedy. Tragedy heid him in her grasp, but his face was furned to comedy, as if inclining to her. A friend asked him which he preferred, turned to comedy, as it inclining to her. A friend asked him which he preferred, a friend asked him which he preferred, tragedy or comedy. "Well," said he, "no matter how sick or how well, how bise or how cheerful, I am always equal to tragedy, but comedy, now—why, comedy's a very serious business." (Applause and laughter).

He then dwelt upon the difficulty in presenting comedy, in so doing, said he, the actor, in his opinion, should be unconsciously homorous, he should be unconsciously homorous, he should be unconsciously homorous, he should be unconscious of what was intensely laughable to his authence. Teiling a Joke was a different thing. Of course a man ought to see the point of his own joke. Here he cited Scote I, Act V., from Hamlet.

In conclusion, Mr. Jetterson amounced that he would now answer any questions the committee might put to him, as he thought that would be more interesting and less formal for his audience.

"If I cannot answer them," said he, "you must forgive me, but I suspect you'll think me far more interesting when I cannot answer than when I can." (Laughter).

Before proceeding with the questions.

Before proceeding with the questions, however, he gave some amusing personal experiences. Once, said he, as he made his exit from the theatre after a performance (when he was on a starring tour), a severe looking man, with large eyeglasses, met him in the aisie with the following:

"Do you not think, Mr. Jefferson, that starring tours are among the most perfolious things ever thrust upon the public."

"Sir." said he in response, "when I was a stock actor I looked upon every star as a tyrant; when I became a star I looked upon every stock actor as a conspirator." (Applause and laughter.)

He proceeded to show the origin of "stars" in the dramas of William Shakespearle, citing Coriolanus, Romeo and Juliet, Macbeth, and others, as portraying each, in one or two characters, some passion that made the leading and vital interest of the story.

THE QUESTION BOX.

THE QUESTION BOX.

"Now," said he. "I am ready for the questions. He declined Mrs. Anderson's offer of a chair, and continued to stand white answering those which site presented to him upon a slip of paper.

The first was: "Is Ibsen likely to live as a dramatist and become popular?" To which, amid load applause, the wholesome actor responded:

"I think not, and, I may say, I hope not. Ibsen is a materialist, and his material is not of a very good kind." He had, he said, no objection to realism if it was not offensive and did not so too far, but he had never seen anything that was morbid that lasted any length of time. When Wagner's music and other classics were dead "Home, Sweet Home," would still live! (Applause.)

The second question was: "Was the starring system hurtful to the drama?"
Here Mr. Jefferson's liminiable laugh pealed out. "Why," said he, "here you come again about the starring tours. I've answered that, you know." (Laughter.) Few plays, said he, admit of several great actors. He dweit upon the individuality of the actor. A literary man's book is his work; but the actor's individuality is part and body of his work. If plays were written admitting of reveral great actors in them the public would have a great entertainment, but the public would have to pay for it.

"The third question was passed up from ment, but the public would have to pay for it.

The trird question was passed up from among the audience, and had to do with the real province of the drama.

"Its province," said Mr. Jeffarson, "is primarily to entertain. We don't want to go to the theatre to be preached to. I personally should not like that. But if you can construe a play and get a moral, that is as it should be, but the moral should always be in the best humor.

It is never the mission of the moral to degrade—never! Every work is good or bad in proportion to the effect it has upon the audicince.
